

California Native Plants

There are so many beautiful California native plant species that will thrive in your garden. Adding native plants to your garden not only reduces the need for pesticides, but also reduces the need for summer water. New native plants need regular water their first two summers to establish roots. Afterward, they require minimal water. Note: Many native annuals and perennials grow well from seed, but they're best planted in fall to utilize winter rainfall. Native plants also provide food and shelter for our native wildlife, including bees, butterflies, beneficial insects, and hummingbirds.
